This Level 2 Digital Technologies course builds students' skills in database design, programming, and digital media development (including web design and digital process skills), strengthening their ability to create purposeful digital solutions in authentic New Zealand contexts. Students will design and refine relational databases to manage and present information effectively; develop structured programs using sequence, selection, iteration, and functions to solve problems; and design engaging, user-focused web and digital media outcomes that apply recognised usability and design principles. The course emphasises planning, testing and debugging, asset management, iterative development, and reflective practice, alongside ethical considerations such as digital citizenship, accessibility, and data privacy. Through project-based learning aligned with NCEA expectations, students will deepen their technical competence, creativity, and problem-solving skills, preparing them for Level 3 pathways, vocational technology fields, and further study.
